Foreword

The indispensable merging of advanced education and research, both generating new knowledge and producing new manpower for the sciences, engineering, and the humanities has occupied a unique role in the teaching–research nexus.

Two critical issues, more apparent in the last decade, have been identified and systematically addressed: the pool of research evaluators and the financial resources available for research. Significant strides have been made to cast a faculty roster that peer–reviews the influx of research proposals which reflect a sense of expertise that translates to measures of quality in both basic and applied researches. Also, a modest success to increase collaboration with reviewers from foreign universities has been evident in the last couple of years. Conversely, sources and mechanisms of financial support for the researches completed in the last two decades were those which were primarily derived from private or government scholarships; the majority is extraordinarily self–supported or is at least partly subsidized. Continuing efforts to facilitate students’ access to research grants have become more insistent in recent years. While seeing dramatic increases in graduate researches, this remains one of the biggest challenges graduate researchers and this Office face.

Discernible trends reflected in The UST Compilation of Graduate Researches: 1990–2008, can be informative for prospective researches in the pipeline. A closer look at the implications and needs revealed by these trends, and some useful projections is overshadowed by the lack of thematic research categories that would resonate throughout. This Office is delighted to undertake the unique responsibility in redirecting this research agenda and to orchestrate support to our faculty and students in enhancing their graduate research experience by providing a supportive, stimulating, and enriching academic environment.

With a wealth of deliberated strategies and inventoried research categories and capability, a useful road map for thematic researches, which are interdisciplinary in nature, becomes evident. This is probably the most instructive upshot of this compilation. We are commencing to support our faculty, in the context of facilitating greater collaboration across disciplines. A platform towards developing a broader and a more interdisciplinary graduate research that bridge disciplines is crafted. At the core, this will help encourage collaborative research, a necessary component for today’s societal challenges. Students who have particular special interests, or seek nontraditional research paths are encouraged to venture in this interdisciplinary approach.

Lastly, it is the present intention of this Office to spawn not only critical thinkers and researchers but entrepreneurs who will use innovative ways in both basic and applied spheres.
